Saving the Eight Amendment

Within hours of the referendum date being confirmed, the Save the 8th campaign was officially launched in Dublin. Campaign leader Niamh Uí Bhriain said a Yes vote would be a “horrible and tragic mistake”.

She said politicians are asking people to trust them and are “effectively seeking a licence to kill”. “The public cannot trust politicians with the right to life in the womb,” she said, adding that “there have been more flip-flops in the Dáil than on the average beach”. Mrs Uí Bhriain said Tánaiste Simon Coveney has had “four distinct positions on abortion”.

Also speaking at the launch, Dr John Monaghan, a consultant obstetrician, said he believes there is “no medical evidence to get rid of the Eighth Amendment”. He said he had delivered between 4,000 and 5,000 babies during his career and had never been prevented from protecting a woman’s life by the Eighth Amendment. Dr Monaghan said many doctors like him are pro-retain and he said others who are campaigning for repeal were giving “their personal views, not professional”.

Nurse Marie Donnelly said abortion was not healthcare and she would give up her career rather than take part in an abortion. She said the Government plan for abortion “will add an intolerable strain to an already broken service”.

Vicky Wall, a mother who lost her baby soon after birth, also spoke, saying “we are being asked to sanction every abortion in Ireland for people like me ... I for one and others will not stand by while our suffering is used to inflict death on perfectly healthy babies”.
